Q: How to check if Entity Framework is enabled in Visual Studio 2010? How can I check if Entity Framework is enabled in Visual Studio 2010? I could find it in Project properties, but its not possible to find it in the solution properties. A: In the Solution's Properties Window, set an environment variable called TF_DIRECTORY. That will point to the directory containing T4 templates. Then look for a file named csproj.targets in the directory. The csproj.targets file has a property called TemplateDirectory which contains the name of the T4 Template Directory. A: The template 'EdmMetadata.tt' contains a TryGetEntityFrameworkT4Template method that should return a list of all the property template/method templates that exist in your project. From there you should be able to drill into the list of the different entity framework templates and find the one for "CodeFirst" (because of the T4 name, I am guessing it is the default one). Q: Can you use ATS to classify documents automatically? I know that there are services to classify documents online, like TurnItIn. The problem with these services is that they are based on keywords, not on context and semantic distinctions. For example, the test questions in many English exams are "What is the name of something A is used for?" The correct answer to this is can, but the names of can and an, for example, are highly semantically (and grammatically) related. Can you use ATS to solve this problem? More specifically, can you use ATS to choose the single best answer to a question like "What is the name of something A is used for?" How much can ATS do? Is it possible to solve the above question automatically, e.g., by exploiting its semantics? A: I think there are several types of question to which ATS can be applied. The first set are vocabulary and vocabulary-related questions, such as which multiple choice answer is the right one. Semantic questions fall into this category. The second type are sentence level questions, such as which sentence is the best answer to a question like "Which sentence do you like best? Did you have fun at the party last night?" Here, ATS will try to answer the question. But it may only get one answer right,
