The reticulocyte parameters in anemic patients (n = 127) and healthy individuals (n = 76) were analyzed by flow cytometry to determine whether such parameters would be a useful tool in detecting the cause of anemia. The following reticulocyte parameters were measured: concentration, mean fluorescent intensity (MFI), and percentages of reticulocytes with a DNA content in the subpopulation of lower side scatter (SSC) and in each of two populations defined by SSC and the forward scatter (FSC) of the reticulocyte. The median concentrations of all three reticulocyte parameters were lower in anemic patients compared with controls. The MFI of reticulocytes in subpopulations of lower SSC as well as in the total reticulocyte population was lower in anemic patients. The percentages of reticulocytes with DNA content in subpopulations of lower SSC and in each of the two populations defined by SSC and FSC were also lower in anemic patients. The results suggest
