Slurry seal used as a foundation course is one of the methods widely used for cementing an underground structure such as a mine shaft or a tunnel, and particularly useful because of its features such as substantial progress in the construction, low cost, and low soundness. Concrete used in such a course, however, generally has a poor vibrating body and is therefore poor in fluidity, and as a result, the course is very difficult to apply. The assignee of the present application developed an improved vibrator of a type which is disclosed in U.S. patent application
