However, all of the above patents have focused on an integrated circuit design, in which all of the recording and/or reading operation is performed at one or more predetermined sites in an order corresponding to the order of the recording and/or reading of the recorded or read data. In another patent, assigned to TDK Corporation, a near field optical disk apparatus for reading and/or writing data from or to a disk is disclosed which allows the writing and/or reading of data to/from the disk to be performed on a data area provided at a position other than the data area in an inner or outer diameter of the disk. This is particularly advantageous since such an apparatus and/or method allows access to the data area without problems such as the flying of the head. As well, use of the data area in the position other than the data area is advantageous since it allows the disk to be accessed more quickly than in the case of a conventional method in which the data area is provided at the position in the inner or outer diameter of the disk in a fixed manner.
