Non-infectious diseases are the principal cause of morbidity and mortality in the aged. However, ageing has a major impact on immunity and people aged 65 years and over present an increase of morbidity due to infectious diseases. Chronic infections and immunological disorders are more frequent in the elderly and they are associated with a low quality of life. When the immune system is challenged, the ageing process induces a shift of immune functions as a decrease of naïve CD4 T cells, particularly of CD4+CD45RA+CD27+ cells, an increase of memory CD4 T cells, such as CD4+CD45RO+CD27+ cells, and a functional decline of both innate and adaptive immunity. These age-related immune changes are due to both the intrinsic effects of ageing and the effects of chronic stress. The main problem in the aged is the decline of immune response to pathogens and the subsequent increase of morbidity and mortality. It has been proposed that at least 50% of infectious diseases could be prevented by an appropriate immunisation.
